CHRONOLOGY

OF THE

REBELLION.

THE real commencement of the war just terminated was when a Southern convention, in which eight States were represented, met at Vicksburg, and passed resolutions in favor of opening the slave trade. This, which was in May, 1859, was followed in October by John Brown's mad attempt upon Harper's Ferry. For a year the Southern determination to secede, if they lost the election, kept growing more intense; and when the electoral college decided, in November, that Abraham Lincoln was the President-elect, the leaders of the plot determined to make what use they could of the few weeks that remained of the feeble rule of Buchanan; and on the 29th of December, Floyd, one of the leading men of the rebellion, resigned his position as Secretary of War, having already so distributed the most available arms among the Southern States, that the military advantages could not fail to be on their side, should the North resist the contemplated disruption of the Union.

Charleston, ever the hotbed of rampant Southern rights, was the first to take active measures; and the seceders, under Beauregard, after raising several batteries on Sullivan's Island, opened fire upon Major Anderson and his company of Federal troops, who had retreated to Fort Sumter. Edward Ruffin has the infamy of firing the first shot, on the 12th of April, 1861.

Our brief chronology will show the progress and decline of the most terrible civil war the world has ever known.
